NOVARA, Aug. 7, 1891.

We are waiting a few minutes at noon; have just met Prof. P. who goes on with us to Pallanza. We have conducted ourselves very well without him and rather enjoyed it. Mr. E. is first-class to keep things in running order. He and I negotiated for dinner to-day; I exerted my self on the French, and he attended to the business part of the transaction. We spent last night in Turin. Our train came in at half past ten p. m., and we left at eight thirty this morning. The hotel Suisse is just at the depot, so we didn't get much idea of the town. A nicely served breakfast this morning, however, will cause us to remember it pleasantly. As we came out on the train we saw broad, clean streets and pleasant looking houses and gardens. The towns of northern Italy are a restful change from the heat and dirt of Rome. Novara is not a very large place and exceedingly quiet. Some of us took a walk before dinner, along a terrace, which looks down on pleasant gardens—the Alps in the distance; through the market place, where there were great baskets of fruit and tomatoes, past jewellers' stores, which always hold the gaze of some of our fountain hearts, and into a church, with the usual altars decorated with bright tinsel and tissue paper, gilt, etc., and the usual beggar at the door. That sounds as though I were growing tired of churches; perhaps it is true. But the Pisa cathedral impressed me very favorably, indeed. The facade in four parts—tapering upward in a sort of pyramid—with its rows of columns, struck me at once.

But the ride from Pisa to Genoa was best along the shores of the beautiful Mediterranean. Picturesque little towns are scattered along the way; the coast is rocky and irregular, the water deep blue and clear like the Italian lakes. We saw a great many boys and children bathing in the surf and envied them, though the cool, fresh breeze made us think the water could not be very warm. Unfortunately, we had to pass through eight tunnels on the way; right in the midst of a town, or at the very door of some house at the roadside, we would dash into a tunnel, and out again beside another house. Perhaps we appreciated the ocean views more for having those intervals of darkness in which to think of the beauty before and behind us.

PALLANZA, Saturday, Aug. 8.

This is the most beautiful of all places for a Sunday rest. I've been wishing ever since we came that you were all here with me. I hope papa is not sweating down in Missouri still. It seems so selfish when I think how I'm here in August, cool and comfortable, with nothing to do but lounge around and enjoy life generally, and you are all at work, perhaps suffering from the heat. How I should love to transport you every one to this lovely Lake Maggiore for a boat ride with us this afternoon. The little boys would enjoy it, and wouldn't Mrs. P. love to see them! She says she doesn't worry about them. She dreamed one night that J. was dead, but was relieved by a letter soon after which told of the children's welfare. I think she is more eager for news than she cares to confess. Professor P. laughs at the rest of us for caring so much to get our letters, but you see it's quite different when he has Mrs. P. with him. When he was over here alone he was just as anxious for letters as any of us. One of the girls hasn't yet had a letter from home, and I believe Mrs. H. has two small sons unheard from, but we all hope for letters to-morrow.

Mr. Jas. P. was to join us here, but he's not yet put in an appearance. Perhaps he is searching vainly for that lost washing. Professor wrote him to look it up and bring it to us. 'Tis a huge undertaking; fit for one of Pinkerton's men, but if he does come in crowned with success (and the bundle of clean garments), we shall all feel like falling upon his neck. He goes on to Paris with us, I believe. It's my opinion that there will be some interesting developments during the journey. I, at least, expect to be highly entertained by watching the course of events for the next two weeks. I think there was some disappointment that he did not come last night. Newly "shampooed" locks, in all stages of bewitching fluffiness, dorsal decorations and so on were noticeable at the supper table. Everything is ready for the play to begin when once the hero doth appear. I can see your reproachful glances, so I'll make an end to disrespectful allusions.

We came to Pallanza at five o'clock yesterday p. m. From Arona, we took a steam boat; came past the Borromeo Islands, and bits of picturesque coast. The town is not very large, but we're off at one side, on a promontory, with a most delightful lake view. The hotel is very pleasant—large summer resort—"Grand Eden" by name. The grounds are nicely laid out; beds of old fashioned flowers, zinnias, touch-me-not, larkspur and dahlias. Then there are roses, oleander jasmine, (I think it is), evergreen, a magnolia tree in blossom, and that purple flower Mrs. J. so often wears.

There are ever so many little shady walks and nooks, and, best of all, boats for rent just down in front. Some of the crowd went out last night. We enjoyed looking down on the water from our window, and will take our ride this afternoon. My American flag floats in the breeze; it is pinned to an umbrella handle and tied to the window. The effect may not be very imposing from the standpoint of Italian lookers-on, but I can't resist the desire to see our colors waving. 'Tis not conspicuous from below, for we are in the top story, yet Hattie Rounds said she saw one of the 'Cooks' party point to it as they came in last night. We have the honor of being in the same hotel with a 'Cooks' party—thirty odd they are in number. Evidently they're to spend Sunday here, too. Wonder if they'll go over the Simplon Pass when we do. From all I've seen of them they seem like very ordinary people. There are a number of elderly people; one old lady, the chaperone, I suppose, wears a lace cap with little red bows on it. We contemplate fixing Mrs. Powers out in that style. She is altogether too lively for a chaperone and needs something of that kind. I think I'll turn back now and tell whatever comes to my mind about the places we've lately passed through.

Pisa first.—The town impresses you as dull and quiet. The things we came to see are all near together at one side of the city. The cathedral, I spoke of before, pleased me exceedingly, and the beggars 'round it were exceedingly annoying. They have picked up enough English to use on foreigners, and we heard "poor old blind man" on every side. Even a woman, led along by a girl, was repeating the same words. The Baptistery stands opposite the church; it is called "the finest in the world." Its round, and the interior with its high bare dome looks rather plain and grim. But there is a wonderful carved marble pulpit. 'Tis supported by seven columns; the pulpit itself is six-sided, has the Annunciation Adoration of the Magi, Presentation in the Temple, Crucifixion and Last Judgment in the relief work. Then there is a large font in the centre of most beautiful, delicate marble carving and mosaic. There is a wonderful echo inside. The custodian gave several musical calls for our entertainment. The clapping of one pair of hands is redoubled and multiplied into prolonged applause. The cloisters of the Campo Santo are very near the church. As we neared the entrance, one of those everlasting beggars ran up and knocked on the door for us before we had time to do it ourselves and then stood there to be paid for it. Of course, there was nothing to do but give him a copper, but such impudence is aggravating.

Later.—We've had our boat ride, and were out about two hours. The lake is beautiful, with the mountains all around us. We had some funny experiences. The boat had two sets of oars, and we wanted to be independent, so we took no man along. Miss R. and Miss H. row quite well, so there was no danger. You should have seen me try to row. I amused the crowd immensely by letting one oar get down into the water so far that I couldn't manage it and it stuck into me and nearly sent me overboard. The oars are very heavy and clumsy, and I think it was a great deal to my credit to use them as well as I did. The water was a little rough and the wind blew some, so we undertook to let down the awning. It was accomplished with some tipping and a great deal of manoeuvring. Then I broke an oar (it was cracked already) and the girls had to bring us home with one pair; and all our trouble because we didn't have a man along; still I don't believe we were sorry, any of us. We've found out that the big party is one of gaze, and most of them English and Methodists. The leader is the oldest man in the lot, gray haired, but business in his eye. He rose to-night and announced that there would be service at eleven o'clock to-morrow morning in the hotel and anybody is invited. Then a minister rose and said there would be service at two in the afternoon in a little church in the neighboring town, which church was recently converted from Catholicism to Protestantism. If any of the friends would like to go (it seems they do designate the members of their caravan), arrangements would be made for omnibuses to come for them. If, furthermore, any of the friends had scruples against taking an omnibus on Sunday, they might, of course, walk, though he believed it was up hill most of the way, and as for him, he thought this an exceptional case, though he did not as a general thing advocate driving on the Sabbath. We noticed the wine bottles on their table, and were somewhat surprised to learn that they were mostly Methodists, but I suppose traveling in Italy is an "exceptional case."
